

money is a system vulnerability. That vulnerability can be exploited. As explained below, I believe the system can be hacked, and the hack can make the system better.

Enter JamPAC

On February 22, 2016, my wife Elizabeth and I became the proud directors of a new super PAC. The process to create a super PAC was surprisingly simple and while we are both attorneys, it certainly didn't exhaust any of our legal skills to do so. It was as easy as filling out a five-page form and electronically filing it with the Federal Election Commission — no fee required. As the immediate purpose of our super PAC was to support the Bernie Sanders' campaign, we called it Do The Right Thing, in homage to Spike Lee, who had just endorsed Sanders. (Later, we changed the name to JamPAC, inspired by the concept of "culture jamming" as well as Bernie's skill on the basketball court.)

Our pro-Bernie super PAC was born after Elizabeth spent weeks volunteering for the campaign — she called voters, went to rallies and "Bernstorms," and organized phonebanks at our law office to get out the vote in the Democratic primaries.

Elizabeth had started to seriously "Feel the Bern" after being thrust suddenly into the national political discourse due to a well-publicized altercation with Donald Trump. At the time, we could scarcely believe that Trump — a businessman of dubious integrity and success who fled from Elizabeth's presence screaming when she asked to take a pre-arranged medical break — now had a legitimate shot at the Republican nomination. The prospect of a Trump presidency caused us to seriously scrutinize which Democratic candidate was best-equipped to stop this nightmare scenario from happening. For us, the answer was plain
